

relatively egotistical

When I was young, I used to break the mold. Nobody blamed me and said I'm creative and clever. By growing a little by little, I felt something was colder. It was the sight of the people..... who told me that I could fly. During my school days, my wings were torn, and I was depressed. When I tried to fly, my classmates pulled me down enough to step on me. Why? Why do they pull me down even though I am not harming anyone? I felt nervous and sank down into the void. It was more than jealousy, more than egotistical. It was relatively egotistical.

Relatively egotistical does not only exist in humans, but animals. London business school professor Gary Hamel had an experiment about this. He put 5 monkeys in the cage with a banana on the top of the ladder. If one monkey climbs a ladder to reach a banana, the professor will pour water on the other monkeys. They repeated a few times. Then, the other monkeys started to pull down a monkey who climbs. After that, the professor started to change old monkeys to new ones. As a result, monkeys just pull down even though no one knows what happens if they reach the banana. By this, I think there was no instinct and the instinct was made.

Like the previous paragraph, Instinct is not natural. It is more similar to a tradition or habit. It is because all creatures are like a blank sheet of paper.....which means novice. Like we didn't have an opinion when we were young, the very first species can't know what is dangerous or safe. They made an instinct because they started to know something. It is the same as believing in god or any powerful creatures because both of them have a tradition, like bible or instinct. Most people who believe in god try to live kind because they believe they will go to hell unless they live kind. They are afraid to go to hell because they know hell is hell. Like these, all instinct or tradition were drawn from the blank, which is the same as 'made'.

Why did they do such a cruel thing? Instinct. Is it natural? No, absolutely not. Why It is made? Because they know..... that's it! They did that because they knew what would happen if someone succeeds. They learned to pull down to succeed. They believe that because they were blank.

Little by little, society is becoming more relatively egotistical.
